The images are taken from her grandfather's collection. They are images of her family. The photos lied in a sandy colored box, almost abandoned. Some of them lied alone, others were wrapped in little packets that the author kept closed. All of them seemed so different in her memory, they looked so happy, as if the story itself could have been different.

How can the reality be so different from the one everyone builds in their head?

Between silences, secrets and memory lapses there are so many stories and with them the author can build her own.
